Golf is back.

A return to prominence.

Golf has been as much a part of the history of The Greenbrier as the Springhouse itself or the colors of Dorothy Draper, and the summer of 2017 promises to mark another historic milestone at America's Resort.

FROM THE COVER

Major flooding turned lives upside down throughout West Virginia on June 23, 2016, and at The Greenbrier, the waters had a devastating impact on the championship golf courses that are part of the resort's 11,000-acre playground.

The Meadows Course and The Old White TPC Course were almost completely destroyed, and The Snead Course, exclusive to members of The Greenbrier Sporting Club, and The Greenbrier Course sustained significant damage. The destruction on The Old White TPC forced the cancellation of The Greenbrier Classic - the annual PGA TOUR FedExCup stop at The Greenbrier - for 2016, and only The Greenbrier Course has been open for play since that tragic day.

Ten months later, golf at The Greenbrier is on the path to a major comeback.

In early June, a completely redesigned Meadows Course, with updated routing and new signature bunkers, will open for play, providing an exciting new opportunity for golf enthusiasts. Meanwhile, The Old White TPC is finishing up a complete restoration that includes new fairways, greens and bunkers on every hole and some fresh design elements that will make one of the best courses in America even better. The oldest course on the PGA TOUR will open for play just in time for The Greenbrier Classic, which will make its celebrated return to America's Resort July 3-9, 2017.

"The scars from the flooding will long remain, but we couldn't be more excited about the work that is being done and the future of golf at The Greenbrier," said Burt Baine, Director of Golf, The Greenbrier. "These courses are going to be tremendous and will create a major buzz around the golfing world when guests experience them for the first time."

FROM THE COVER

Then there's The Greenbrier Course, the home of the 1979 Ryder Cup. Twelve holes of this historic course will remain open throughout the summer, while Phil Mickelson and his design team get to work on six new holes on a new piece of property that will add a fresh look and feel to the already grand course.

If you need some instruction before you hit the links, The Greenbrier has you covered there, as well. Golf instructor Billy Winters is among the best in the business, and Golf Professional Emeritus Lee Trevino will be back for his third straight summer, providing group and private lessons, as well as meet and greets with guests of America's Resort.

"Where else can you receive instruction from one of the legends of the game before you head out for your round?" asked Baine. "It's a unique opportunity, and Lee is amazing in both his instruction and his story telling."

Golf packages are currently available, allowing golfers to group together golfing and accommodations, as well as book unique experiences for a golf trip they will remember for a lifetime.

The summer of 2017 will be a tremendous season for golf at The Greenbrier, and we hope to see you here. For more information, visit www.greenbrier.com/golf.
